1. Terminal project dredges up environmental fears (Standard Times - April 20) NEW BEDFORD — The large-scale dredging of the harbor connected to the development of the 20-acre South Terminal site will involve the use of a CAD cell, stirring up fears among local environmental groups who say it is a potentially dangerous way to clean the harbor of toxic pollutants. The plan for the $35 million marine project, which officials hope will be the staging area for Cape Wind and make New Bedford the center of the offshore wind industry in the Northeast, is under review by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. A final response is expected in a few months, said EPA spokeswoman Kelsey O'Neil. The current plans call for the materials taken from the floor of the harbor to be buried in a confined aquatic disposal or CAD cell — a pit at the bottom of the harbor that is covered with a cap of clean sediment.

2. 'Canal clean-up' celebrates Earth day (Cape Cod Times - April 20) BUZZARDS BAY — AmeriCorps Cape Cod and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers will host a cleanup of the Cape Cod Canal on Saturday to celebrate Earth Day. Volunteers are invited to the 12th annual "Canal Clean-Up" from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m., with coffee and bagels served until 9:30 a.m., according to AmeriCorps spokeswoman Christin Marshall. Volunteers should meet at the Buzzards Bay Recreation Area at the base of the Railroad Bridge off Main Street. There also will be tables with environmental educational materials and kid-friendly activity booths, and the Falmouth Fiddlers are expected to perform, according to Marshall. If it rains, the meeting location will be moved to the Herring Run Recreation Area, she said.

3. Community invited to clean up Thompson (Norwich Bulletin - April 19) In celebration of Earth Day, the Army Corps of Engineers will host a clean-up and projects day Saturday. Registration begins at 8 a.m., with projects running from 9 a.m. to noon. Lunch is noon to 1 p.m. To participate, bring work gloves and meet at the Overlook Shelter off West Thompson Road. For more information, call Michelle Dwyer at (860) 923-2982.

Terminal project dredges up environmental fears

NEW BEDFORD — The large-scale dredging of the harbor connected to the development of the 20-acre South Terminal site will involve the use of a CAD cell, stirring up fears among local environmental groups who say it is a potentially dangerous way to clean the harbor of toxic pollutants.

The plan for the $35 million marine project, which officials hope will be the staging area for Cape Wind and make New Bedford the center of the offshore wind industry in the Northeast, is under review by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. A final response is expected in a few months, said EPA spokeswoman Kelsey O'Neil.

The current plans call for the materials taken from the floor of the harbor to be buried in a confined aquatic disposal or CAD cell — a pit at the bottom of the harbor that is covered with a cap of clean sediment.

The use of a CAD cell is not one of the EPA's concerns, which focus on the environmental impact to nearby wetlands and the flounder and quahog populations, O'Neil said.

"We are in favor of CAD cells at the moment," she said, adding that the level of PCBs — toxic polychlorinated biphenyls — in the area proposed for dredging falls below the level required for action by the EPA. "From our point of view, it would actually be cleaning up a portion of the river that wouldn't be cleaned up by EPA."

Before Lt. Gov. Tim Murray's visit last week, state officials met with local environmentalists, who are already fighting a different CAD cell proposal related to contaminated material in the lower harbor, where the level of PCBs is higher.

"We are very supportive of the (South Terminal) project. ... What we're against and why we go to these meetings is we want to prohibit the burying of PCBs in our harbor," said Karen Vilandry, vice president of the Hands Across the River Coalition. "You don't just cover over things. You properly dispose of them."

The harbor already contains three CAD cells from earlier navigational dredging projects, two of which remain completely uncapped, said Ed Anthes-Washburn, director of operations at the Harbor Development Commission. Plans for the South Terminal project include capping those cells, he said.

Piping polluted material to a de-watering facility and then shipping it to a PCB-licensed landfill, as Vilandry is calling for, would increase the project by 10 times, officials said. CAD cell disposal costs about $60 to $75 per cubic yard and the alternative would cost about $600 per cubic yard.

"The only way they will ever dredge is with a CAD cell," Anthes-Washburn said.

It's not clear what happened to the "Standard Times Field site" around this same location. Is it possible that the 20-acre South Terminal site itself may be still contaminated and is considered a brownfield site ? <http://www.epa.gov/region1/brownfields/success/new...> "The EPA-Conducted TBA revealed some localized contamination issues, such as the presence of a large underground storage tank with surrounding soils contaminated with petroleum hydrocarbons, a layer of coal 1 to 2 feet below the soil surface in an area suspected of being a former coal bin, and some asbestos associated with building debris. Soil throughout the site contained hydrocarbons, PAH's, pesticides, PCB's, and metals. There were elevated levels of PCB's in the groundwater on one lot and of heavy metals on a few lots."

'Canal clean-up' celebrates Earth day

April 20, 2012

BUZZARDS BAY — Ameri—Corps Cape Cod and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers will host a cleanup of the Cape Cod Canal on Saturday to celebrate Earth Day.

Volunteers are invited to the 12th annual "Canal Clean-Up" from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m., with coffee and bagels served until 9:30 a.m., according to AmeriCorps spokeswoman Christin Marshall. Volunteers should meet at the Buzzards Bay Recreation Area at the base of the Railroad Bridge off Main Street.

There also will be tables with environmental educational materials and kid-friendly activity booths, and the Falmouth Fiddlers are expected to perform, according to Marshall.

If it rains, the meeting location will be moved to the Herring Run Recreation Area, she said.
